Cryptocurrency scams

Cryptocurrency is hot, with the price of one Bitcoin reaching $100,000 for the first time in December 2024. That may be good for savvy investors, but the hype could lure novices into cryptocurrency scams — with huge potential losses. In 2023, the FBI's Internet Crime Complaint Center (IC3.gov) received nearly 9,000 cryptocurrency complaints from people age 50-59. Their total losses: more than $900 million. People age 60 and older registered nearly 17,000 complaints and reported losses of $1.6 billion. (The numbers are probably far higher, because scams are notoriously underreported.)

Scammers use dating apps, messaging apps, social media and other communications to build relationships and trust with their targets, then share their “expertise” on investments, frequently promising large returns and little risk. In 2023, this “confidence-enabled cryptocurrency investment fraud” was the most prominent type of crypto scam, the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) reports.

Criminals often show victims fake profit reports, which encourages them to invest more. But when investors try to withdraw funds, they're frequently charged outrageous fees. The bogus companies then typically vanish before investors receive their money.

How to stay safe: If you're interested in crypto but lack expertise, talk with a financial advisor. And watch for impostor sites that mimic actual companies. In California, one victim transferred over $127,000 to two crypto exchanges, one of which was Celestia.bet. The true network, however, is Celestia.org.

To confirm that a company is legit, make sure it's registered with the Commodities Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) and the National Futures Association. Also avoid companies with no physical address or customer service line, the CFTC suggests.

Also beware of requests to pay for something or address an urgent financial matter with crypto; they may ask you to use a crypto ATM. “Crypto is the payment method in a lot of different scams,” Velasquez says, because it's hard to trace and payments usually can't be reversed.
